The war is not over in Lebanon...
Its cities bombed, its children maimed and killed, its hospitals destroyed, Lebanon is still an occupied country. The Israeli army will remorselessly pursue its aim of destroying the PLO in Lebanon and creating a pliant Phalangist neighbour to its north.

Pushing north to Jebayel, the Israeli army threatens to attack the Palestinian refugee camps outside Tripoli, a town of half a million people. There are still five thousand PLO fedayeen active in the Bek'aa valley. There are 30,000 Syrian troops entrenched in Lebanon, the Israeli's show no sign of leaving Lebanon before they get out.

Also the new Phalangist President, Beshir Gemayal, commands 30,000 right wing militia, many thirsting to avenge their defeat by the left in the civil war in the mid-1970s.

The presence of imperialist troops in Beirut 'overseeing the evacuation' is a sign of the unease with which even Israel's best allies view Sharon's intentions.

...The war is not over for Palestine.

The setback in West Beirut cannot be blamed on a lack of heroism on the part of the PLO fighters. Their resistance to the zionist military machine has been truly remarkable. It is a result of the treachery of the Arab bourgeoisies who have shown themselves once again to be the mortal enemies of the Palestinian dent is proof of how by their refusal to defend the Palestinians, the Arab ruling classes has paved the way for reaction in Lebanon — the country where the class struggle was the most advanced, and the socialist movement the most developed, in the Middle East.

But make no mistake, despite the dispersal of the PLO militias, the Palestinian revolution is unvanquished. Its centre of gravity will now of course shift to the Occupied Territories and to within the Israeli state itself.

Two million Palestinians are still living within Israel's present borders. Two million who will continue to refuse the authority of the zionist state which has dispossessed them of their land, disbanded their town councils and murdered their sons and daughters. They provide increasingly necessary labour for the Israeli economy — this is the contradiction which zionism cannot eliminate.

The task of the hour, however is to campaign for massive medical aid to Lebanon, and for solidarity with the Palestinian people, defence of the Lebanese left, for Israel out of the Occupied Territories, and for all Israeli and imperialist troops out of Lebanonl

This will mean continuing to challenge the shameful silence of many on the left of the labour movement in this country. Since 6 June when Israel invaded there has no longer been any excuse for failing to understand the murderous character of the Israeli state which is expansionist and racist in its essence.

They are emboldened by their success at driving unemployment up to a record near 3.3 million — which is almost one in seven of the working population. They have got away with swinging cuts in the public sector. And they are encouraged by their defeat of the train drivers. The Tories now feel this is the time to drive home their advantage.

They are confident that their union bashing combined with the reduction of inflation to single figures, as well as the three percent cut in the mortage rate has done them the world of good with their supporters.

The Tories came to power determined to weaken the unions and intent on winning electoral support from big sections of the middle class as well as sections inside the working class. The 51 percent support they clocked up in one opinion poll shows that they could have had some important successes in their sime

This is why we make no apologies for returning once again to the health dispute. This is a battle between the working class and the Tories that can be won. Behind the health workers stand unions representing millions of members, who have shown by their actions that they are prepared to down tools and come out in support. One decisive call from the TUC could bring the great battalions of labour into action.

The outcome of such a victory would be enormous. This solidarity action would tear the Tebbit Bill to shreds and open up a great breach in Tory wages policy. It would even have the potential to force the Tories out of office.

This action would reverse the process of capitulations in cars, steel and other sectors where the union officialdom has rolled over before the Tory steamroller.

If the labour movement loses this one it will be much harder to fight the zero pay limit next year. Alternatively to defeat the government now would encourage the workers to fight back against wage freeze, unemployment and attacks on the welfare state.

On the domestic front nothing is as important as winning the health workers' pay claim. Socialist Challenge

Scottish steel workers in 1980 — will Sirs let them down again?

Steel closures challenge Triple Alliance and TUC

By Des Tierney

ALMOST 200 steel jobs are to go in Sheffield and Scotland if the recently announced closures go ahead. This new onslaught on the British Steel industry cannot go unchallenged. Despite the feeble response from Sirs, general secretary of the steel workers' union, the ISTC, the signs are there for a fightback from angry workers. In Sheffield, Cliff Wright, the ISTC's River Don convenor, said that 'with the jobs lost in the area there is nowhere for us to go. If we have to sit in, we will sit in.'

Steelworkers
throughout Scotland are preparing to fight for the survival of their industry.
The announcement last week by the British Steel Corporation of the closure of Parkhead forge in the east end of Glasgow and the closure of the Clydebridge works on the outskirts of the city involved the loss of 1000 jobs.

This is bad enough, in an area where many of the towns have an unemployment rate of over 20 per cent, but it is the threat which these closures pose to the giant Ravenscraig steel works in Motherwell—one of the three bulk steelworking complexes in Britain and still employing over 5000 workers—which makes the present redundancy notices so important tant.

One of the plants to be closed, the Clydebridge platemill, is a major customer of the Ravenscraig works, and it is feared that as the BSC management continue to cut production in the wake of falling demand the Ravenscraig works will be chopped.

That's why the fight at Clydebridge and Parkhead are so important and the workers are ready to fight for it.

Workers at Clydebridge met representtatives of BSC management with a very angry picket when the closures were being announced. They were particularly angered that one of the reasons given for the closure was their one day strike the previous week in support of the health service workers.

TUC

Jimmy Burtney, the chairperson of the joint shop stewards committee is adamant: 'we are determined to fight this closure. We have a young workforce at Clydebridge who are not interested in redundancy money. They're interested in their jobs.'

Joe Cairney, shops steward convenor at Parkhead was equally determined, 'the workforce here are shocked and disgusted. This closure has nothing to do with our work content, rather it is indicative of this Tory government's policy and their treatment of Scottish industry.'

Unfortunately the anger of the workforce is not reflected by the Scottish TUC. Jock Henry, the deputy chair of the STUC took the opportunity of the closure announcements to call for import controls and support for the Alternative

Economic Strategy, 'The only long term solution involves import controls and the expansion of the market.'

Clive Lewis, the Scottish organiser of the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation is arranging meeting with the STUC, the miners and the railworkers to discuss joint action through the Triple Alliance.

Andy Barr, Scottish organiser of the NUR has already stated that he is confident that NUR members would support joint action with the steelworkers.

So far Labour MPs in the steelmaking constituencies have been conspicuously lacking in ideas.

Fight

Underlying some of the reluctance to propose industrial action is the fear that such action could hasten the end of BSC's operations in Scotland. Those workers still employed fear threatening their own job prospects even further if they take on BSC in what they consider could be a futile battle.

The failure of the STUC and the Labour Party to stop the closure of Talbot at Linwood, the Singer plant at Clydebank and the Invergordon aluminium smelter obviously doesn't fill the workers with confidence.

But steelworkers will also remember the tremendous fight put up by the women at Lee Jeans factory at Greenock and the Plessey factory at Bathgate. Their militant action and the mass campaigns which they were able to inspire in their support shows what would be possible if the full weight of the steelworkers was used to stimulate such a campaign throughout Scotland.

surgeon at the Southern General Hospital, Glasgow. The Southern General is one of the largest hospitals in the area and its workforce has been right at the forefront of the demand for 12 percent.

Mr Galbraith has spoken at meetings and rallies throughout Scotland in support of the claim. He is one of the few members of the medical profession to have done so and his contribution has been valued by those who are struggling for a just settlement.

Mr Galbraith is a Labour Party member, and is also a member of the Medical Practioners Union, which is a section of ASTMS.

He gave the following interview to Marie Louise Irvine, also a doctor and a member of ASTMS.

Why do you support the dispute?

Medicine needs a team approach. I can't do my job without help from lots of people and many of these people are getting below subsistence wages. I am concerned with the whole of the health service not just my work. I have to support the health workers who have subsidised the health service for years.

Do you see the Tory government pay offer as part of a general attack on the NHS?

Yes, I do. There are many issues involved. There is an of the main issues. The healthworkers are fighting for a decent living wage the 12 percent. At present we are fighting the Tories on a specific issue. And it is around this issue that the whole trade union movement must unite.

I support it. The health service belongs to everyone and a national stoppage in solidarity would be an effective way to show the government that there is overwhelming support for the claim.

Do you think the present struggle is making people more aware of the threat to the NHS?

One of the great spin-offs

The Grampian Association of Health Service Unions have called for a half day stoppage in Aberdeen city factories and offices for Friday 27 August, the day after the RCN ballot results. There will be a demonstration and rally on the same day and Aberdeen Trades Council are coordinating the campaign to broaden the dispute. Workplace meetings and mass leaflatings are being organised. and mass leafletings are being organised.

In Aberdeen at the moment emergency and accident cover is being operated, and 19 out of 27 medical record staff are on indefinite strike. The strike committee see that the only way forward for the dispute locally and nationally is solidarity from other workers.

attack on the health service and the trade union movement. In recognising is that it has brought the NHS into the limelight once again. The Labour the NHS, but now socialists are realising there are big problems that have to be sorted out.

What sort of problems?

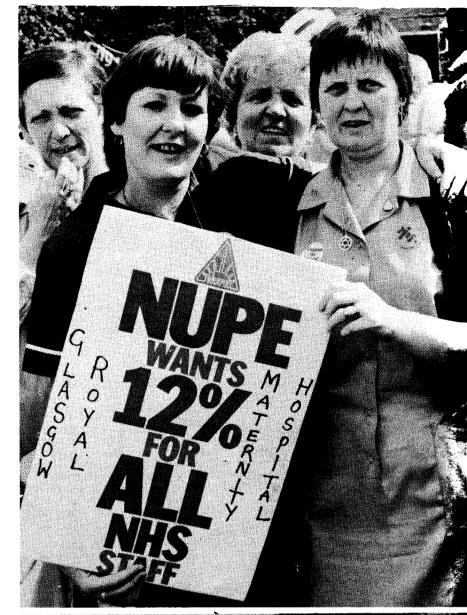

Lack of money, poor management, lack of accountability by medical profession and the encroachment of private medicine. Services are being reduced by the Tories. Greater Glasgow Health Board has announced cuts of £6 million, that will seriously affect health care in this city. Four wards may be closed at the Southern General. It is not the case that bed places are being redistributed. They are being reduced.

What is the best way to fight the cuts?

The only solution is a political one. It has to be through the trade unions and the Labour Party. We have to campaign so that improving the health service and reversing the cuts is high on the Labour Party agenda, and to make sure they do something about it.

How do you tackle the problems you described?

We need a campaign in the Labour Party to raise consciousness about the needs of the NHS. The Tory Health Act of 1980 did a lot of damage to the NHS. There was little response from the Labour Party. This was very bad. It is most urgent to defend the health service. Remember it's easier to prevent things being done, than to fight them once they have hap

Message from Scottish health workers

'We can win!'

BELOW two Scottish health workers speak to Socialist Challenge about their pay claim.

DANNY CAROL is a 24-year-old theatre orderly at the Southern General, Glasgow. His takehome pay is £53.18 and £65 if he works a weekend.

I want to stick out for the full 12 per cent. I think we could get it. Even if the RCN settle it won't make any difference, they have never been involved in the industrial action anyway.

This is the first time I have been involved in a strike. We have always been exempt before. But when this one started we went to our union rep' and said we wanted to do something.

At this hospital the laundry workers have been out for 12 weeks — they get strike pay of £40. The ODA's who are the operating department assistants, have been on strike for six weeks. We keep six out of ten people working to cover emergencies. We divide the wages between us which gives us £40 and then we also give money to the strike fund.

We know that some patients will suffer, because of the dispute. But that is the fault of Thatcher's government.

The action of other workers in supporting our dispute has boosted our morale. For a time things were down but now they have lifted. The picket line had been falling off, but when shipyard workers came down to picket and gave a large donation, this really en-couraged us again.

Sean Geraghty's action was great, there are not enough guys like him about. Chapple refused to support his members and I reckon he should be in Mrs Thatcher's cabinet.

I just hope we can get more solidarity. Stuff the Tebbitt Bill. The TUC should organise solidarity action. The working class has a lot of

I hope that because of this experience they will come to union meetings after the dispute.

Other women are coming forward because of the strike. The 12-week strike in the laundry has been the backbone of the strike here and they are all women

Socialist Challenge 28 August 1982

THE BENN HERESY by Alan Freeman

By Phil Hearse and Bob Pennington

UNDERSTANDING the politics of Tony Benn and the 'Bennite' current is crucial to grasping the prospects for socialist advance in Britain. The ideas of Benn and his supporters represent the main left-wing opposition to Toryism and right-wing Labourism in Britain today.

Whilst Benn and Bennism are not revolutionary and Alan Freeman resolutely defends Benn against such an accusation
— it still remains a fact that a genuine mass revolutionary socialist movement will not be built without both confronting Bennism and also fighting alongside of it. To paraphrase Trotsky, we have to take the reformist workers seriously, because they take their own ideas seriously.

At every stage of the political crisis reformism appears in new and often more left-wing forms. Bennism is the latest of these and we can be confident it will not be the last. Bennism nevertheless has a certain distinctiveness in that it does have a more or comprehensive political solution to the British economic and rolitical crisis. This political crisis. This nerefore assures it of a political rtain durability.

the right wing has had the effect of actually radicalising him. He was pushed to the left when he saw how the capitalist state sabotaged radical change. This prompted Benn to take up the theme of democracy in a way which the Bevanites were never prepared or even wanted to do.

Policy

The Bevanites always saw the battle with the right as being simply about policy. For them parliament was the focal point of change and the supreme representative democracy. For Benn, parliament appears as the end-point of the democratic process — a process that begins with the mass movement.

The theme that parliament must be more democratic, more accountable and really sovereign, as opposed to the bureaucracy of the civil service, the multinational corporations, and the capitalist class in general, pervades Benn's speeches. The theme of democracy and mass action from below is a crucial part of the distinctiveness of Bennism.

Alan Freeman considers that the raising of the issue of democracy and making it a central concern in British politics is Benn's most crucial achievement. however does not accept Benn's argument that parliament can be made truly sovereign. As a revolutionary Marxist he obviously does not reject an elected assembly on a point of principle, but he recognises that what matters is on what type of state such an assembly When that is a does capitalist state then it is impossible for the mass movement to impose its will through parliament.

Freeman's discussion of 'marxism and democracy', his account of the cir-cumstances in which civil war might be needed to defend parliament against the capitalist class, and his explanation of the inevitable limitation of real parliamentary sovereignty in the capitalist state are probably the strongest part of the book.

The other distinctive feature of Bennism is the alternative economic strategy or AES, which in-cludes limited nationalisation, workers' participation and planning agreements with the major capitalist companies on investment and output to reconstruct the ailing economy. The left-wing critique of this is we assume well known to our readers. But Freeman here does bring to light an element of wide-eyed uto-pianism in Tony Benn's thoughts.

Benn thinks agreement with the capitalists might be possible. He attributes almost magical powers to the talisman of the 'popular will' to get fundamental change. This is Benn's blind spot. He rejects the idea that the ruling class might engineer a coup against a left-wing government. He completely underestimates the possibility that the British ruling class, in alliance with international capital will do everything in their power to de-stabilise a left Labour Government as a prelude to its fall.

Assault

Benn does not seem to understand that when you have an economic and political crisis of the proportion we have today, any future Labour government will come under a furious assault from domestic and foreign capital. The only time when this will not happen is if the Labour left and the working class as a whole have been utterly defeated. Even a government of the Foot-Healy type would be given the

The IMF-engineered runs on the pound in 1965 and 1975 would be childs' play compared to what they will do next. Although Foot might be at the helm the strength of the Labour left still makes a Labour government 'unsafe' in the eyes of the ruling class.

To have any chance of surviving in office the next Labour government will have to immediately move against the sabotage of domestic and foreign capital. Nationalisation of banks, control of the import and export of capital, the taking over of the finance houses and steps towards nationalising the big monopolies will have to be top-rated items on Labour's agenda.

Control

This will require the mobilisation of the trade union movement. measures can only be done if the workers in these industries and financial institutions supervise and control the bosses. Workers control will be the necessary measure to stop capitalist sabotage. Benn refuses to face up to the idea of such a dramatic confrontation. When asked about this in interviews with Socialist Challenge, Socialist Organiser, and Capital and Class he tries to fob it off with; 'That's what I call the Allende question' or make jokes about 'my old tin hat and rifle'. Benn, as Freeman points out, sees revolutionary change, not as the mass mobilisation of the working class which acts as essential motor force of the transition, but either as a putsch or an 'industrial coup' - the actions of a minority. Benn's political thinking is therefore essentially flawed because he underestimates the lengths to which the British ruling class will go to suppress bialist change.

Does that therefore mean revolutionary Marxists should shun the Bennite forces? Of course not. As Freeman says Benn does address himself to the crucial questions. This means that the first task is to be with this mass movement inside the Labour Party and the trade unions where we can fight with it against the right wing. Bennism represents the furthest stage of left development of all but a minuscule minority of the working class. There is no question of influencing this movement from the sidelines or imagining that it can be by-passed by a new layer of workers coming into struggle. The se-cond task is to arm the Bennite supporters with an understanding that only a Labour government that breaks with the capitalist class and is committed to socialist policies and has the means to implement them can avoid a terrible debacle.

Anyone who wants to understand the crisis of British capitalism, the character of the Labour right, the role of Thatcherism and what makes Bennism tick, can do no better than read Alan Freeman's book.

The Japanese anti-nuclear movement

30,000 people assembled on the evening of 5 August in Hiroshima's Peace Park to hear an appeal by the chairperson of the National Japanese Congress against Atomic and Hydrogen bombs (Gensuikin). The park was again packed the next morning on the anniversary of the bombing. At exactly 6.15, the time of the explosion, everyone stood to observe a minute's silence for the victims. At 8.21 a flock of doves was released to symbolise the wish of the people of Hiroshima for peace.

CHRIS PITTS, a Sheffield bus driver, has been spending his holiday in Japan. Chris is a CND activist and has been concerned to find out about the Japanese movement. He sent us this report from Tokyo.

THIS YEAR a new wave of anti-nuclear sentiment has developed in Japan which has mobilised hundreds of thousands of people. Many left-wing activities were taken by surprise last March when 200,000 people responded to a call by the SOHYO* national union federation for a demonstration in Hiroshima against nuclear weapons. Two months later on 23 May in Tokyo, 400,000 attended a second rally again called by SOHYO.

In a country where government policy is 'neither manufacture nor possess, nor allow the introduction of nuclear weapons', the basis for such a movement would seem to be missing. In fact the reason lies in Japan's special relationship with the United States of America.

The crux of this special relationship is AMPO, the Japan-US Security Treaty. Signed shortly after the end of the US occupation it gives the US armed forces virtually unrestricted access to Japanese land and naval bases and air space. It has always been unpopular with the Japanese working class. Hundreds of thousands demonstrated when the US was using Japan as a staging post for the war in Vietnam.

Against this background, the roots of the new anti-nuclear movement can be traced back to the candid remarks of ex-US ambassador Edwin O. Reischauer in April 1981, that if the US wished to store nuclear weapons at their facilities in Japanese ports, they would feel free to do so without prior consultation with Japanese government. In short, the US military can do what it likes in Japan, and to hell with the wishes of the Japanese government could only plead ignorance, since under the terms of AMPO they have no right to know anything about US military activities in Japan. Militant

The immediate result of this was a small but militant demonstration against the USS Midway entering Yokosuka Naval Base, south-west of Tokyo, the following June. The ship was en route to joint US-Japan naval manouevers, and was widely believed to be equipped with nuclear missiles missiles.

Between these two events, in early May, the Japanese and US governments had issued a joint communique describing their relationship as an 'alliance'—interpreted by many commentators as meaning a military alliance. The reason that this caused such dismay here is that most progressive forces defend the famous Article 9 of the constitution, which renounces Japan's right to wage war. Accordingly, for several years, there have been many indicators that the hawks in the government and ruling class are actively softening public opinion for a revision of the constitution.

Test

Hardly a year has gone by without some government or public figure making a public statement to test public opinion on the question of Japan possessing nuclear weapons, or changing the constitution (Article 9). Every year, it is traditional for the Prime Minisfer to attend Yasukuni shrine, where Japan's WW2 officers and unknown soldiers are buried, but this has usually been in a personal capacity. In the last few years, subtle changes have taken place in this ritual which give it the character of an official function, leading some Japanese to believe that the government is on the verge of exonerating its role in the second world oblique, the most recen actions of the Education Ministry in censoring school history books is quite clear. The Ministry has insisted that the wor ding of textbooks should be changed to describe Japan's invasion of China Korea etc as ar 'advance' rather than ar invasion', and tha describing passages Japanese atrocities in those countries should be toned down before it wil approve them. This action has caused a storm of pro test from the countries in question and in Japan itself. The Ministry however, remains ada mant, simply insisting tha it will make more effort to explain its reasons to thos countries.

Gallop

Although reactionar remarks have long bee heard and seen from government ministers and SDF officers, the fact that the ruling LDP won an in creased majority in the las election has increased it confidence to the exten that the rightward shift ha become a gallop. Its mos recent action was to revis the system of Uppe House elections to assur itself a bigger majority i the future. Against the background, and the fact that most of the union bureaucracies are als moving to the right, findin it more comfortable t accept the ruling class's ex cuses that recession mean austerity and lay-offs tha to fight against them, the new anti-nuclear move ment is the largest an fastest growing part of wider radicalisation.

Another factor fuellin this anti-nuclear move ment here has been the ar nouncement by the U that it intends to equi hunter-killer submarines cruisers and destroyers of the Seventh Fleet servin in the West Pacific (an hence using Japanes ports), with Tomahaw missiles, during 1983/8-It is not clear at presen whether they intend to in stall long-range types wit nuclear warheads, or cor ventional warhead short range missiles, but since the US is also discussing the possibility of installin Pershing II Cruise missile on Japanese soil, most as tivists are drawing the own conclusions.

Joint

Self-Defend Forces, it is pointed ou have a lot of equipment to cope with the effects nuclear war such as radia tion suits, and also posses convention many weapons which could eas ly be converted to nuclea ones. The SDF had on conducted joint exercise with the US using sea an air forces, but recent they have also bee holding joint excercises in volving ground troop Adding all this together provides the basis for emergence of a mass ca position movement desp: the government's form position. *SOHYO is the largest of :-

YOU HAVE probably never heard of General Bernard Rogers. Well he is not all that important, except in one respect. He is a man who can decide whether or not you become a nuclear cinder! General Rodgers is the NATO supreme commander in Europe.

Last week they interviewed him on TV and he was most insistent that NATO is only 'defensive' and what is doing is defending 'freedom' against the 'threat' of the USSR. Now if you are one of the 40,000 political prisoners being tortured in Turkey or one of 12 million unemployed in the EEC, General Roger's platitudes on freedom must have a hollow — some would say exprical — ring.

What's more he is a man prepared to do his job, come what may and that means 'being dead is better than being red' and he will 'press the button' if his conscience dictates.

General Rogers learned from US military academies like West Point who teach a simple ethic which was well put by the military lunatic who burned down a village in Vietnam and slaughtered most of its inhabitants and remarked afterwards '... it was necessary to destroy the village in order to save it.'

He told his TV interviewer he would use 'nukes first', saying this is our 'deterrent today'. This somehow contradicts the idea of Mr Healey and Mr Shore that having 'nukes' stops anyone using them, because if one side used them no one would survive.

This stuff probably sends shivers down your spine — if it doesn't then it ought to. Perhaps you dismiss it by re-assuring yourself that General Rogers is a 'nutter'. Well I have bad news for you. He is not a 'nutter'. He is a class conscious servina member for capitalism, who will burn you and millions like you to frazzle if he thinks it will be in the 'interests of freedom'. That is freedom for imperialism to exploit the majority of the world's population.

Our youth march on its own will not stop General Bernard Rogers but it can help to build a movement that will do so. Make sure you and your organisation supports it — after all, you can hardly fancy an early and very painful death.

THREE young people from the greater Manchester area told PAUL ATKINSON why they will be marching to Blackpool.

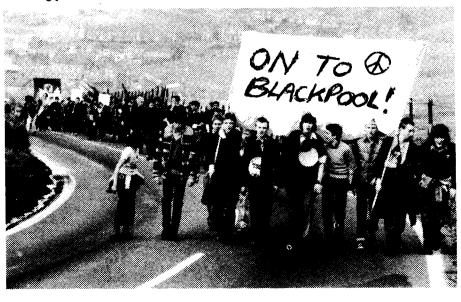

LEE of Stockport YCND says: 'I will be marching to show this Tory government that we don't want their missiles. After a year on the dole the chance of me getting a decent job is nil. Yet they spend 12 billion pounds on missiles. I think this money should go on creating jobs.'

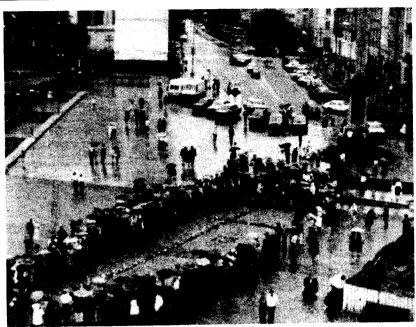

DAVE from Oldham YCND reckons, 'We should tell the Tories we have had enough. Thatcher should not be allowed to get away with what she has at the expense of ordinary people's jobs. It shows where her priorities lie. The Tories' slogan is "profits not people". But it's time for us to put things right by forcing a future Labour government to stop spending money on nukes and pay youth a decent wage instead of the poxy £25 we get on YOP schemes.'

MARK CUTTS, who from Hazel Grove, wants to 'go on this march because when Thatcher and her Tory government attacks the working class, they at-tack the youth even harder. All the money that they spend on defending their interests, like in the Malvinas war, police pay and so on, could be better spent on things like real jobs and the like real jobs and the health service. At the last Labour Party con-ference a two-thirds majority voted for unilateral disarmament. I want to make sure that if a Labour government gets in at the next election they act on this."

Key test on Polish anniversary

By O. MacDonald TWO YEARS after the great strike wave that launched Poland's independent labour movement, Solidarity, Poland's underground movement resistance demonstrations mobilising and protests aimed to show that working class support for their independent organisations remains as strong as ever. The campaign will reach its climax on 31 August the second anniversary of the Gdansk Agreements which marked the Stalinist government's capitulation to the demands of the workers in 1980.

The coup d'etat by General Jaruzelski in December last year was a bad defeat for the Polish workers' movement, but it failed to crush Solidarity. Some elements within the Jaruzelski regime have been pressing for a second wave of terror and violence to try to finish off the underground resistance movement once and for all.

Others, the so-called 'liberals' like deputy Premier Rakowski, favour a mixture of repression of key working class activists with a prolonged period of political manouevring to divide Solidarity and wear it down, using the exhausting economic crisis and the conciliationist stance of the Church hierarchy as weapons in this cam-

In every major city, Solidarity's activists have regrouped around networks of factory committees and clandestine bulletins which the police have been incapable of penetrating and suppressing in significant numbers. Since April a national coordinating committee has linked together Solidarity's regional leaderships in four important areas — Gdansk, Warsaw, Wroclaw and Cracow-Nowa Huta. Huge demonstrations at the start of May and very widespread token strikes on 13 May marked a first show of strength by the underground. The present mobilisation will mark the second key test for Solidarity.

So far the movement has remained firmly united in action, without any significant breaking of ranks. But a major debate continues within Solidarity on the aims that the movement should persue. A big part of Solidarity's intellectual advisers together with some leaders like Lech Walesa are prepared to acknowledge that Solidarity went too far in the past and are ready to make basic changes in the organisation's structure to transform it into a non-political trade union and accept a lengthy strike ban because of the economic crisis. On the other side the bulk of the underground activists see Solidarity's basic aim to be a mass movement to bring fundamental democratic change, breaking up the whole bureaucratic structure of the political system.

Linked to these disagreements on aims, the two groupings seek to adopt different tactics. The 'pure trade union' trend argues for tactics that will re-assure elements within the regime that they can achieve lasting co-operation and good-will from Solidarity if they are ready to restore its legal rights.

On the other hand, the activists of the underground movement favour tactics which will eventually force the regime to grant major concessions or face the prospect of a second revolutionary upsurge on the scale of the Gdansk commune of 1980.

At present the Jaruselski regime has no intention of entering into any serious negotiations with any section of Solidarity and the differences within the movement have not therefore become a political factor of the first importance. The government has been hoping that the more conciliationist trend within the leadership of Solidarity, aided by the pressure of the Church hierarchy and prominent circles of intellectuals around the movement would gain the upper hand, as the movement saw the level of active working class support declining. If such a trend were to develop then the need to have serious negotiations with Solidarity would decline and an entirely new trade union structure, entirely under bureaucratic control could be established.

The mobilisations up to 31 August will therefore be a crucial test of strength for both Solidarity and the government. Indications so far, including Jaruzelski's hurried visit to the Crimea to see Brezhnev last week, suggest that the regime fears it may have underestimated the scope of support for the Solidarity undergound.

NEXT MONDAY, 31 August, the underground leaders of Solidarnosc are calling for a massive display of defiance against the Polish regime. Already there have been riots in the major Polish towns, but especially in the port of Gdansk, the birthplace of Solidarnosc. Last week ten thousand workers demonstrated in Gdansk against martial law and for the release of Lech Walesa, only to be met with the water cannon and truncheons of the police.

On 31 August the workers of Poland will be commemorating the Gdansk agreement signed on that day two years ago — the agreement which recognised Solidarnosc and the right of the Polish workers to their own independent trade union. On this anniversary PAUL LAWSON describes the events which led to the agreement.

Food price rises have a way of sparking off rebellions in Poland. In December 1970 the giant price rises decreed by the party leadership led to riots in which dozens of Polish workers were killed. Again in June 1976 a 69 per cent increase in the price of meat led to nation-wide rioting.

On 1 July 1980 the Polish government introduced a new price system for meat, which effectively transferred some of the better, cheaper meat, to the so-called 'commercial' shops — which are reserved for the bureaucracy. This time there were no immediate riots, no spontaneous explosion. But, as the workers began to see and feel the effects of the move, work began to stop in some of the major factories, including the Ursus tractor factory, the Mielec aircraft factory and a vehicle parts factory near Gdansk.

The workers were demanding wage rises to compensate for the government's measures pushing up meat prices. This was just the start of a vast wave of strikes. Under orders not to put up too much resistance, and to get the matter over with as soon as possible, the factory managers began to concede to the workers demands. But, as the managers conceded, the scale of the workers' demands increased, so much so that some of the workers who had already settled for five per cent went on strike again demanding more. In some places the wage increase demands were as much as 20 per cent.

as much as 20 per cent.

There was no national strike because there was no workers' leadership to co-ordinate such a strike. However a series of 'rolling' strikes took place which shook the regime. Party leader Gierek went on television on 10 July to say that there would be no nation-wide wage increase—claiming the country couldn't afford it ford it.

At this stage a new force came onto the scene. The KOR, the Workers' Self-Defence Committee, began to co-ordinate information about the strikes and eventually became an active force linking up the factories in struggle. During July some 150 plants took strike action. After years of bureaucratic mismanagement, the Communist Party leadership was seeing the emergence of a generalised challenge to its rule.

As the whole world now knows, the major challenge to the bureaucray started to emerge at the shipyards in Gdansk, specifically the huge Lenin shipyard. At 4.30 am on 14 August, members of the semiclandestine 'Free Trade Union of the Coast' gathered outside the gates of the shipyard to meet the 17,000 workers going in. They were demanding the reinstatement of one of their activists, Anna Walentynowicz, a long-time supporter of free trade unions. All the guiding nucleus of the Free Trade Union, and its newpaper Robotnik Wybrzeza, were subject to constant police and management harassment. The group saw the new attempt by the management to sack Anna as the opportunity to bring the Lenin shipyard behind the nationwide strike movement.

From 4.30 am onwards the workers started to give out their leaflets. Eventually their demands were taken up inside the yard. The scene that followed has been recounted many times. Workers addressed the shipyard employees from the top of a crane. They were successively addressed by the unfortunate shipyard manager Gniech, and by exemployee Lech Walesa who had been helped over the wall earlier in the morning.

The meeting went indoors to negotiate. Walesa and others from the Free Trade Union were at the forefront of the negotiations on the first day. The workers demanded a one-third increase in pay, re-instatement of sacked workers, earlier retirement and the abolition of the special 'commercial' shops. They demanded a monument to the workers who had been killed by the police in 1970 — a demand eventually conceded by the shipyard management.

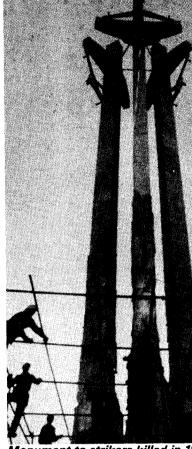

The strike spread. The Paris Commune shipyard in Gdynia came out. Workers throughout Gdansk began to go on strike. The demands of the workers had gone far beyond the narrow concerns of the shipyard. By Saturday 16 August the negotiating committee at the Gdansk shipyard was on the verge of reaching agreement — on a 1,500 zloty a month wage increase reinstatement of sacked workers and no victimisations. This agreement represented a major concession by the shipyard management.

But the negotiating committee of the workers at the shipyard was getting out of contact with what was happening in the rest of the area, where large numbers of workers were striking. The ending of the strike by the Gdansk shipyard would have led to the government picking off the other strikers. The strike committee split but a majority voted to settle. A delegation from the Gdansk public transport garage arrived to demand that the strike be continued.

Lech Walesa's announcement over the public address system that the strike was over was greeted with heckling. Then Walesa changed his mind and went round the shipyard demanding the strike continue. Delegations from other plants swarmed to the Lenin shipyard. That evening the Inter-Factory Strike Committee, the initial nucleus of Solidarnosc, was formed. The radical minority of the strike committee at the Lenin shipyard had effectively outflanked the basis leading to the Gdansk agreement. These demands included the right to strike, independent trade unions, freedom of expression, pay increases, more rest days, freeing of political prisoners and a series of demands for better conditions and services.

The second of the second second

The formation of the Inter-Factory Strike Committee entirely transformed the situation. What had started as a series of independently organised strikes, had been transformed, thanks to the role of the Workers' Self-Defence Committee and the Free Trade Union of the Coast, into a general confrontation with the government over basic workers' rights. From now on the negotiations at Gdansk became a focal point for the whole movement.

The strike spread even further. 25,000 workers went on strike in Szczecin, including in the Adolf Warski shipyard. Tadeusz Pyka, one of the government's deputy prime ministers, went to Gdansk to negotiate for the government. As the tension rose, party leader Gierek went on television and promised better pay and food allowances, better welfare provisions, an investigation into workers' conditions and a reform of the official trade unions, the CRZZ. These proposals were unacceptable — the right to an independent trade union had become a crucial stumbling block.

Deputy prime minister Pyka attempted to split the workers by insisting on separate agreements with the different enterprises, but the Inter-Factory Strike Committee held solid. Pyka was recalled to Warsaw and replaced with senior deputy premier Jagielski. Day after day of intense negotiation followed. The whole of Poland was watching the negotiations. The government went into crisis, and a re-shuffle among the bureaucrats took place. But for the time being Gierek kept his post. The intellectuals and the Church rushed to support the movement.

The government put forward a demand which was to shape the whole outcome of the agreement—that the Inter-Factory Strike Committee accept the leading role of the party. Massive tensions built up among the negotiators on this point. Many workers were unhappy about the acceptance of such a clause in the agreement. 'The leading role of the party' in Eastern Europe is a synonym for the continuing domination of the bureaucratised Stalinist parties, completely tied to the state apparatus.

Eventually the formula was hammered out. Point one of the agreement began: 'The unions endorse the principle of social ownership of the means of production, constituting the foundation of Poland's socialist system. Recognising the leading role of the Polish United Workers' Party in the state...'. Eventually Walesa forced acceptance of this point through. The main points of the agreement became: 1) Recognition of the leading role of the party, 2) Recognition of the right of free trade unions, 3) Recognition of freedom of the press and 4) Recognition of the right to strike.

The accords were signed among scenes of jubilation. But many of the workers outside and inside the shipyard gates seemed disappointed that the strike was over. Had the negotiators made too many concessions to the state? Did they have to capitulate on the leading role of the party?

Time has shown the Gdansk agreement was, in fact, notwithstanding the acceptance of the opening paragraph, a massive victory for the Polish workers. In recognising free trade unions, the authorities had opened the floodgate to the development of Solidarnosc. Their insistence on the 'leading role of the party' was tantamount to giving notice that they intended to take all their concessions back. But the Polish workers were not betrayed by the Gdansk agreement and the similar one agreed at Szczecin. It constituted a crucial turning point in legitimising the struggle to organise the Polish workers in the fight against the bureaucracy — a fight which is far from ended.

What is Trotskyism?

Lessons of 1848

John Ross continues his historical explanation of the growth and development of revolutionary Marxism. This week he explains why the capitalists could no longer play a progressive role and how their fear of the newly emerging working class dominated their approach to all the big social and economic struggles.

By John Ross

THE FAILED revolutions of 1848 in Germany were a turning point in world history. Until then the capitalist class had been a revolutionary force leading the struggle against feudalism. But in Germany, in the decisive clashes, the capitalist class had capitulated to counter-revolution.

Marx contrasted the role of the German capitalist class in 1848 to that in the great French revolution of 1789, saying 'The bourgeoisie in France...had broken down all obstacles to the rule of its own class. The bourgeoisie in Germany...carries out the counterrevolution for its own tyrants.' (1)

But why had the German bourgeoisie acted so differently to its revolutionary predecessors in France and England? And what political consequences flowed from it? This was the question which Marx and Engels had to address in the light of the experience of 1848.

As to why the bourgeoisie now turned to reaction in the most decisive struggles Marx readily showed reasons. earlier capitalist revolutions, for example England in 1642-48 or France in 1789, the bourgeoisie had not been afraid to launch revolutionary decisive struggles because the working class was still exweak. tremely bourgeoisie could control and utilise the revolu-tionary struggles of the working class and peasan-try simply for its own pur-

Allied

As Marx wrote, 'In 1648 (in England) the bourgeoisie was allied with the modern aristocracy against the monarchy, the feudal aristocracy and the established church. In 1789 (in France) the bourgeoisie was allied with the people against the monarchy, the aristocracy and the established church. In both revolutions the bourgeoisie was the class that really headed the movement. The pro-letariat and the nonbourgeois strata of the middle class had either not yet evolved interests which were different from those of the bourgeoisie or they did not yet constitute independent class divisions.

By 1848, however, an entirely different situation had developed. A powerful working class had already developed in a number of countries and was forming in Germany. The bourgeoisie knew that any really mass revolutionary actions would now begin to unleash this working class.

As Engels put it, 'all parties know that the struggle impending in all civilised countries is quite different from, infinitely more significant than, all previous revolutions; in Vienna and Paris, in Berlin and Frankfurt, in London and Milan the point at issue is the overthrow of the political rule of the bourgeoisie...Is there a revolutionary centre anywhere in the world where the red flag, the battle emblem of the united proletariat of Europe, has not been found flying on the barricades during the last five months 1848)?...every uprising that now takes place is a direct threat to the political existence of the bourgeoisie and an indirect threat to its social

Therefore in 1848, as from now on in every revolution, 'The German bourgeoisie...at the moment when it confronted feudalism and absolutism, saw menacingly pitted against itself the pro-letariat and all sections of the middle class whose interests and ideas were related to those of the pro-letariat.' (4)

The result of this situa-tion was that the bourgeoisie was now more scared of working class revolution than it was of feudalism. The key goal of the capitalist class had become not revolution but, 'Suppression of every political move of the pro-letariat and of all social strata whose interests do not completely coincide with the interests of the class which believes itself to be standing at the helm of state.' (5)

Epoch

By crushing the working class, however, the bourgeoisie also destroyed the revolution. As Marx put it, 'The commercial and industrial sections of bourgeoisie threw themselves into the arms of the counter-revolution for fear of the revolution.

A new epoch of the struggle therefore opened up. Prior to 1848 the capitalist class had vacillated and hesitated on smaller questions but taken mass revolutionary action at the decisive moments. Now, however, the bourgeoisie would take progressive steps on secondary questions but capitulate on the most decisive.

Such a shift required a total transformation in the political perspectives of the working class. As long as the capitalist class had been prepared to lead revolutionary struggle against feudalism then the working class had to ally with it and support it in that struggle. But what happened when the bourgeoisie would no longer lead revolutionary struggles? The answer which Marx gave to that led directly to the theory of permanent revolution.

Reading

Marx's writings on the revolutions of 1848 are among the most important articles and written. A very good collection is available as The Revolutions of 1848' in Penguin Books.

The only difficulty in reading Marx and Engels on this period is the large number of events, names and places which are only of historical significance and not familiar today.

NICARAGUA Washington's phony peace plan

Nicaraguan troops patrol near Honduran border

By Brian Grogan

PRESIDENT Reagan's hopes of 'destabilising' revolutionary Nicaragua were persued over the weekend under the guise of a phony 'peace plan'. According to Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Thomas Enders, Washington will supposedly end its military involvement in both Nicaragua and El Salvador if 'Cuban forces are pulled out of Nicaragua'.

Cuba has no troops in Nicaragua. It has 2,100 teachers, 200 doctors, some health workers, building workers and agricultural experts. The United States has sent no such aid to the Nicaraguan such aid to the Nicaraguan people, despite being ask-

This operation of the 'Big Lie' has as much connection with peace as did Goebbels who perfected such propoganda techni-ques for Hitler. This cynical peace offer is merely to provide a cover for more open US involve-ment in the actual military invasion of Nicaragua presently under way aimed overthrowing revolutionary Nicaraguan government.

Cash

Some 5000 counterrevolutionary organised in large units and possessing sophisticated weapons are now operating out of Honduran camps close to the Nicaraguan border. There are continuous and covert CIA operations Nicaragua. Most of the 50 US advisors in Honduras are thought to be near the border. In July, there was a two week joint US Honduran military operation along the border. This in-volved US pilots, volved US pilots, mechanics and air traffic controllers and two US C-130 aircraft helping to transport a Honduran battallion to the new base just north of Nicaragua.

US military aid to Honduras doubled this year to $10.6m and is due to increase to $16m in 1983. This aid is to include six A-37 light attack planes to add to the dozen or so French Super-Mystere fighters already giving it the most advanced air-force in Central America. It is reportedly seeking US F-5 jets as well.

Coinciding with the joint military exercises, two air attacks were launched from Honduras against key economic targets inside Nicaragua. On the anniversary of the Sandinista revolution, 19 July, and unmarked aircraft from Honduras attempted to blow up storage tanks containing 800,000 gallons of highly flamable fuels at Corinto a town which handles three quarters of Nicaragua's only oil refinery in Managua. Both attacks failed, but potentially could have wreaked havoc.

In response to this vulnerability from air attacks, the Nicaraguan government has been seeking to obtain interceptor aircraft from France, the Soviet Union and other countries. The Soviet Union has been reported as providing come MiG-According to Washington's topsy turvey logic, the possession of defensive planes would be seen as a major escalation'. So, according to the International Herald Tribune: 'Options known to have been under study by the United States and its allies include:

* US military action to destroy the MiG's

* A blockade or quarantine of Cuba or Nicaragua * Tightened US economic restrictions on these two countries

Temporarily stationing US airmen and military planes in Honduras and Colombia

Stepped up supply of US combat aircraft

* Political assualt on the MiG's in the Organisation of American States and other international organisations'

Action

In a diplomatic note earlier this month, Nicaragua protested that the US-Honduran manouevres 'represent a clear and open provocation which appears to be aimed at causing an unnecessary war between Honduras and Nicaragua, with unforseen consequences.' The mounting attacks leave the Nicaraguan government no choice but to strengthen its defences and prepare for a full scale war. On 14 August, the Sandinista government ordered militia units to report within ten days for intensive combat training. The Sandinista Peoples Army remains fully mobilised. Civil defence preperations are under way in all factories and schools neighbourhoods.

Air India: strikes made illegal

By Ian MacDonald

ONCE again flexible 100 of their brothers and rostering has raised its head at Heathrow airport. Air India management imposed new working rosters on 2 June which were out of line with the agreed proceedures.

At the end of June as part of their drive to get the new rosters accepted, a steward was sacked and the works based TGWU branch voted to take strike action.

As with the ASLEF dispute, management is determined to smash the union and so on 4 August it sacked 100 workers. Unfortunately the mainly Asian workforce is split — 200 members are now working the rosters, whilst sisters are outside on the picket line.

Seizing on the division the management have insisted that the workers inside sign a document which terms strikes 'illegal and unauthorised' as per Indian law.

The Hounslow Labour Party has pledged full support for the strike and is building a public meeting which will be used to mobilise wider sup-port for the dispute. The LPYS has consistently visited the picket line in a show of solidarity with the strikers.

Why the recession isn't ending

Pennies from heaven

By Alan Freeman

LAST WEEK it seemed for a moment as if the Confederation of British Industry's dearest wishes were coming true. Interest rates fell for the fourth time this year; another cut in mortgage rates was said to be on the way.

Share prices boomed on Wall Street; that mysterious financial totem, the Dow Jones Index, saw its biggest one-day leap ever. American interest rates, the cause of anguished squeals from every treasury in Europe, were going to fall.

Was this the light at the end of the tunnel? Was John Wayne finally going to rescue the world from recession?

Not quite. On Friday, Financial Times reported that the government 'received three pieces of bad news on the economy from official figures published yesterday'. These were:

 Capital investment (already at an all-time low) fell again this quarter. Manufacturing investment fell most sharply at 4.5 per cent, concentrated in new plant, which registered a 7 per cent drop.

 Manufacturers stopped restocking, which generally signals a generally downturn.

 Cyclical indicators. predict future economic activity, turned down in July, having risen since last autumn.

Nor is America doing so wonderfully. The shares boom relates, not to its strength, but to its weakness. The boom followed pronouncements by Dr Henry Kaufman, the so-called 'guru of the bears' who, having predicted high interest having rates for most of this year, has now changed his mind. Why? Because things are worse than he thought they were. In a letter to clients of Saloman Brothers, his company, he explained that the 'expected business recovery of 1982 is now less likely to materialise'.

Credit

Industry is now so badly off, and so conditioned to recession, that it has given up hunting for easy credit from the banks.

In short, as the Financial Times commented, we are witnessing a new long postwar event: a postwar recession. After two years of 'waiting for the upturn' there is now a growing suspicion that the wait will be a long one.

The Economist Intelligence Unit, in its latest forecast, says that there was a slight rise at the beginning of this year but that 'the impetus has now ended, however, and we do not see a further stimulus to overall output occuring until early 1983'.

The Unit expects this recovery to be deepened by Conservative-Liberal-SDP coalition in 1984. This will really set us on the road to riches with an unemployment figure of 2.7 million by 1986. This is its 'optimistic' forecast. We won't go into the pessimistic one.

Behind these developments we can discern the outlines of something very important: the ugly shape of the postmonetarist world

In reality, interest rates have not fallen. They have adjusted to a lower inflation rate. The 'real' interest rate (interest minus inflation) is no lower than last year. Does this signal recovery? Neither has in-flation been conquered, nor has the basis for recovery been laid.

Thirties

The cost of single-figure inflation in the West has been the deepest and most sustained recession ever: probably deeper than the Thirties. This happened, not because the money supply has been brought under control' but because Western governments have con-vinced manufacturing industry that they will no longer serve as guarantors of economic growth. Firms cannot expect to be bailed out by banks who will be bailed out by governments, and so they have finally kicked the postwar habit of running for credit to finance expansion. recognised, relative adjustment of share prices and bank loans recognises that this is a permanent phenomenon. The shares boom was not a surge of confidence in industry: it was a tremor of suspicion about the banks. There is no better proof that monetarism cannot 'control the money supply' than what has been happening in international banking markets. International lending has reached fantasy proportions: the fantasy ended last week in Mexico City.

The problem facing Friedman's disciples is that we live in a private economy. Decisions to lend money are ultimately in private hands. The government can influence, but not control, credit, bank lending and hence so-called 'money creation' by private concerns.

Profits

By raising interest rates ough the roof, through monetarist governments produced a flood of 'hot' money into the banks. Banking profits soared: the already grossly inflated British banking sector recorded profit increases of seventy, eighty, a hundred percent a year.
But where do these profits come from? Banks

make money not by borrowing but by lending. Only in the fairy story world of capitalist world of capitalist economists does money create wealth on its own.

Ultimately, banks grub in the same trough as all other capitalists: the exploitation of your labour and that of your sisters and brothers.

Debt

Banks have to lend money to profit-making enterprises, or they build up a house of cards which eventually collapses. The dramatic decline of industrial production could not but have an eventual impact in the banking system. As Kaufman puts it by a thin capital base and substantial non-earning assets while the massive overhang of debt in the international market also restricted the capacity of the financial institutions to stimulate the economy.'

The banks have been dealing in hope, expectation, oil gambles and funny money instead of real income. In two years alone, short-term foreign lending by British banks rose from £5bn to £30bn!

Mexico

The banks beat a path to the doors of the so-called 'advanced developing countries'. But precisely because the development of these countries was ultimately subor-dinate to that of the imperialist nations, there was a top limit to their ability to absorb 'hot' money. Mexico reached that top limit last week.

The terrifying prospect of a banking collapse now hangs over the imperialist economies. They cannot afford this: the Financial Times now speaks of international banking 'suspending reality' and of the 'delicate task of bringing it gently down to earth'.

But what are the prospects for recovery? Bringing the banks down to earth does not bring in-dustry up from off its knees. A major imperialist world boom would require a single imperialist country or group of countries to take on its shoulders the task of re-expanding world demand. At the end of the last war America took on this task as the completely dominant world power.

Rivals

But the almighty dollar no longer rules. The American government learned this lesson painfully after the 1974 slump, when it led the world out of recession and found that, because its European and Japanese rivals were now strong enough to compete with it on a world scale, they reaped the benefits of American led expansion. Only the forced devaluation of the dollar allowed the Americans to compensate for this effect.

This time round, Reagan isn't playing: im-perialism has fallen victim to a crisis of leadership, and we face a new era of inter-imperialist rivalry. and unemployment.

Welcome back to the thirties.

Mexico or bust

By Alan Freeman

WHY is Mexico going bankrupt? Anyone visiting the sumptuous Hotel Nacional in Mexico City could tell you. The 36 storey tower, funded by a nationalist businessman who swore not to use a single Yanqui dollar, was to be a monument to Mexican endeavour — but ran out of money halfway through.

With only the top two floors complete it was sold at a knock-down price to Mexico's vice president, who rents it out for discos and conferences to raise the cash to finish the rest.

The Mexican economy was built like the Hotel Nacional. Under the banner of 'national pride' incoming president Miguel de la Madrid has inherited a tottering, half-built economy with a splendid half-built frontage and no cash.

The world press once backed the 'spendthrift' policies of the former president Lopez Portillo, whose organisation the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), has monopolised the government for fifty years.

Now it denounces Now it denounces these policies. But they are coming adrift, not because of the PRI's stupidity but because of the bankruptcy of the big western powers, to whom Mexico is in debt up to its neck.

The PRI followed a more astute policy than almost any other third world bourgeoisie. Unlike in the Arab sheikdoms, oil income was not used to finance the exotic pleasures of a tiny clique but to try and create a broad new middle class. With subsidised petrol at an incredible 20p per gallon, a car became the dream of every downtrodden street seller — an entry ticket to an imitation gringo consumer paradise.

State money brought political opponents and fed this growing middle class by pulling it into a vast network of corrupt officialdom, beholden to the PRI and used by it alternately to repress and

Right

The new middle class should, in theory, have spent its money to furnish the demand on which in-digenous Mexican industry would spring up. But where would the capital come from to finance the new industry? And where would the technical know-how and access to markets come from?

The PRI used the timehonoured Western bankers' prescription: borrow by mortgaging oil, and use it to attract the multinationals with cheap grants and cheaper labour. Land-hungry peasants were driven to the shanty towns by cash-crop 'agribusiness': there agriousiness': there swollen slums furnished endless cheap labour for gigantic Volkswagen and Renault plants.

Mexican peso

Total foreign debt[†]

Mexico's debt burden becomes intolerable: the peso crashes

Because the entire country is now in hock. US bankers now claim 56 cents in every dollar of oil sales. Sixty per cent of foreign trade goes to serthese leeches. Paradoxically, the very thing which attracted the new industries to Mexico — cheap labour — meant that the demand for goods within Mexico could not sustain the new expansion.

Slump

While the middle classes darted around the city's eight lane highways their second-hand Volkswagons, the workers, shantydwellers and agricultural workers were lucky to find their next meal. The economy Volkswagons, was based on foreign demand for consumer products made with cheap labour by foreign multina-tionals. Mexico failed to escape the iron grip of dependence on foreign

Once the slump began to bite into world demand for these products, the Mexican government was left, as the Economist succinctly put 'without a bean'

Mexico's bankruptcy is sending shockwaves through the world's big cities — but not out of concern for the people who must now suffer a 70 per cent devaluation and stringent austerity to meet IMF conditions for renewed credit. Nor, indeed, do the bankers really fear that Mexico will not pay up.

Rhetoric

What terrifies them is the prospect of imposing these austerity measures, at the behest of the USA's financial barons, on a people who have been educated in the PRI's rhetoric about 'national independence'. They are worried the people will see the PRI bending its knee before the USA — while on their doorsteps the peoples of Central America are struggling arms in hand against the

If the Mexican working class — now over half the population — decide to break with their capitalist mentors this could lead to a mighty revolutionary explosion whose effects would be felt from California to New York City.

In July's election a million votes were cast for the revolutionary slate headed by the Revolu-tionary Workers Party (PRT), Mexican section of the Fourth International. If this growing demand for class independence ex-presses itself in action, the bankers will have cause to

Ruth First

'Renew our support for her struggle'

THE assassination of Ruth First in Maputo on 17 August represented a new level of aggression and audacity on the part of South Africa. Although many militants have been killed - by letter-bomb or other means — this is the first time that someone of Ruth First's stature on the international scene has been made the target. 'If the South Africans are allowed to get away with this,' said Mike Terry, secretary of the Anti-Apartheid Movement, at the picket to protest the murder, 'then they can get away with anything'.

The assassination of First and the attempted assassination of her colleague, Braganca (his bomb failed to go off) follow in the wake of the bombing of the ANC of-fice in London, a renewed full-scale invasion of Angola, and mounting destabilisation in Mozambique. The key area of Western response to South African aggression is the negotiations on a settlement in Namibia. From the line taken by the five Western powers in these negotiations, the South African regime judges the protection extended by the West to South African dominance of the subcontinent and to the apartheid system itself. First's assassination is one more act of defiance to international opinion, and it must not go unanswered.

But who was Ruth First? She lived in Britain since being forced into exile from South Africa in 1964. At the time of her assassination in Mozambique, where she had helped to establish the Centre of African Studies at the University of Maputo, she was still on secondment from the University of Durham. She used to live in London, in a house in Camden Town still occupied by members of her family. Her husband Joe Slovo is a leader of the military wing of the ANC and lives in Africa, but her mother and three daughters are resident in Britain.

She was well known in this country, as a scholar, an author, and as a pro-pagandist in the solidarity movement. She travelled frequently as an invited speaker and conference participant. Her interests and reputation as a critical thinker extended beyond southern Africa - among many other activities she was recently a member of the International Tribunal on Eritrea, and co-author ed a study of Olive Schriener, an early Schriener, an socialist feminist.

She made her reputation as a writer and in politics as a political journalist exposing the brutality of the apartheid system, in a series of publications which were banned by the authorities. She joined the ANC and the Communist Party, and was jailed. She wrote an account of her experiences in solitary confinement, 117 Days, which was published by Penguin and made into a film on British television.

In exile, she continued as a political activist in the liberation movement but also researched and published further books on Africa. She became an important scholar in African studies, and helped to found the Review of African Review of African Political Economy, an in-dependent Marxist jour-

In their statement on her assassination, her coeditors on the Review said: 'this premeditated murder killed a woman who by her intellect and ability to analyse and publicise was seen by the South African regime as a dangerous enemy. It is shocking but instructive to remember that to clarify issues and speak out fearlessly are regarded as serious crimes by those who killed this remarkable woman.'

Memorial activities for Ruth First and further protests are being organis-ed. For further details and to contribute your own suggestions, contact the ANC, Anti-Apartheid ANC, Anti-Apartheid Movement, or the Review.

In the meantime the issues should be widely publicised. Trade unions,

Labour parties and other organisations of the labour and student movements should send telegrams of protest and demand action by their MPs to identify South Africa as the assassin and force the British government to cease its collaboration.

In honouring the memory of Ruth First and sharing the grief of her family and friends we must renew our support for the struggle in whose cause she was murdered.

Novel exposes Kenyan government

'Devil On The Cross' by Ngugi Thiongo. African Writers Series. Heinemann Educational Books. £2.50

NGUGI Wa Thiongo's latest novel 'Devil on the Cross', written secretely on pieces of scrap paper while the author was detained without trial in 1978, is a brilliantly composed and devastatingly accurate attack on the continued imperialist domination of Kenya. Dedicated 'to all Kenyans struggling against the neo-colonial stage of imperialism', the book's wide readership and popular acclaim will have caused considerable loss of sleep within the ruling circles of President Arap Moi's KANU regime.

Originally published in the Kikuyu language as part of Ngugi's and other. progressive Kenyan writers' quest to reclaim culture, the novel's imagery draws heavily on traditional poems, stories, and songs. These emphasise the long history, and deep roots, the strug-gle for self determination and equality in the lives of the workers and peasants.

The book opens with the central character Wariinga sacked from her job as a secretary for rejecting the sexual demands of her boss, and unable to find any other work in Nairobi, returning to her home

The story follows her fight to control her own life and her refusal to passively accept oppression and exploitation. In this Wariinga mirrors the Kenyan people's own traditions, from the fierce resistance to the initial British invasion, through the 'Land and Freedom' rebellion of the Mau-Mau, to the present fight against neo-colonialism.

The centerpiece of the petition called by the International Organisation of Thieves and Robbers (headquarters New York) to select seven outstanding local experts in modern theft and robbery — the prize consisting of bank loans and directorships.

competitors' speeches boasting of their prowess and experience in the art of exploitation and their suggestions on how to squeeze even more from the Kenyan people are a cleverly written and highly amusing lampoon of the ruling elite.

The novel's politics

uphold one of the main tenets of the theory of Permanent Revolution, that only the workers and peasants are capable of going the whole way in the battle against imperialism.

By S McBirney

This is illustrated symbolically by Wariinga's recurrent nightmare of a white devil, vanquished and put on a cross by the masses, being brought down and revived by black men dressed in suits and ties. The fight of the mass of Kenyan people to get rid of this imperialist 'devil' and his local 'disciples' is the novel's major theme.

Devil on the Cross is published in Britain at a time when the Arap Moi regime, a key element in imperialist strategy for East Africa, is looking increasingly shaky. Facing severe economic difficulty Moi has announced a crackdown on 'subver-'foreign and sion' ideologies' formally abolished the right to form opposition parties, closed three colleges after anti-government demonstrations, and detained eight lecturers without trial.

When Ngugi wa Thiongo himself was detained international protests and publicity in-cluding pickets of the Ke-nyan High Commission in London, played a part in his eventual release. This excellent book should help to acquaint socialists in Britain better with the struggles of the Kenyan people and also act as a stimulus for solidarity with those facing repres-

15,000 dead: made in USA!

By Nick Robin

ISRAEL, with a popula-tion of around 3.5 million people, has for a long time got more US military equipment than any other country. Reagan's budget re-quest for 1983 included $7bn in 'assistance programmes for the Middle East (compared with $500m for Central America). Of this, Israel is to receive $2.485bn of which $1.7bn is military.

This means that this tiny (but expanding!) country will get a staggering 23 per cent of all such 'aid' to US allies worldwide. Furthermore, of this $1.7bn 'assistance', military $500m is in the form of credits, which means it will not have to be repaid, not as money or goods anyway.

Of course Israel by invading the Lebanon has repaid its US sponsors in a different way with the blood of the Palestinian and Lebanese people. It has also given the US military the chance to test out on human beings the barbarous and horrific weapons from their arsenal. The Palestinians and Lebanese have been used as guinea-pigs.

this year while Israel planned the invasion of Lebanon, they received $217,695,000 worth of military equipment from the US, 10 times as much as in the same period in 1980 and 50 per cent higher than in the first quarter last year.

These deliveries included ten F-15 aircraft, 14 tank recovery vehicles, 19 self-propelled 155 mm Howitzers, and over $6 million worth of bombs and ammunition. This was either a remarkable coincidence or the US willingly financed and backed up the Israeli preperations for the invasion.

Perhaps this is what US Defence Secretary Casper Weinberger Casper meant in Congress earlier this year when he explained the budgetary quirements for the Defence Department in the coming year: 'To meet the challenge of this dynamic environ-ment (the Middle East), we must develop robust and flexible programs to support US policy objectives'. Robust, flexible ... and genocidal.
