BURSTING THE FETTERS

Frightened by the revolutionary character of the great British coal strike, our capitalist editors on this side of the water are parad ing the Constitution as an impregnable bulwark of property rights: and a sure preventive against the government here being forced to follow the example of the British Government in considering the enactment of a minimum wage act, under similar circumstances. It requires no mean ability in sophistry, humbug and hypocrisy to make the assurance plausible, but the New York Times is fully equal to the occasion, as may be seen from the following excerpt from an editorial utterance of that paper on March 4:

The British Parliament is as nearly omnipotent as any Legislature can be. There is no constitution to pre-vent its ordering that the increased wage demanded the coal miners shall be deducted from dividends. In this country our written fundamental statute prevents the taking away of one man's property for another man's benefit wi hout due process of law. What would not Englishmen give for such a muniment of property rights, which must be preserved, not through tenderness for wealth, but through regard for wage carners, whose wages would cease with dividends?

The British Government has no constitution. All laws are made by the Legisla ure, and there is no court to set them aside or repeal them. Therefore, when the British Parliament enects a law establishing a minimum wage, it appears to the Times as taking away property "without due process of law." But there are none so blind as these that will not see.

We have a Constitution which the English property owner is represented as envying our postession of. He would like to have one just the same as it-would give almost anything for such a boon. But what for? Not so much, according to the Times, to protect property rights, as out of "regard for the wage earner, whose wages would cease with dividends." It would be hard to parallel even in Great Britain, the land of bourgeois hypocrisy par excellence, an otterance so replete with sorhistry, cant and humbug

If Great Britain had a constitution like ours, the assumption is that the miners, knowing their demand for a minimum wage was unconstitutional, would not think of demanding it. But what the Times editorial overlooks is the fact that the British miners are not asking the minimum wage from Parliament, but from their empleyers. If the latter concede it, there will be no need to pass a law enacting it. If they do not, the question forces itself upon Parliament, which, much against its will, finds itself either compelled to pass such a law, take over the coal mines as national property stand helplessly by and see the industrial life of the nation paralyzed by the strike, the latter alternative being clearly impossible.

If the British capitalists had a constitution or a carload of con-chaos and the entire paralysis of the economic life of the country becomes the only other alternative, the Constitution will display an amazing flexibility despite the popular belief in its rigidity that the Times and the capitalist press generally tries to emphasize and employment of chrome many new alls. strengthen in the public mind. There is no telling what gymnastic stunts a constitution can be put through when sufficient pressure is brought to bear upon it. It has long functioned as a shield behind which the big capitalists carried on the plundering of their smaller brethren, but it does not follow that it can be made to serve as an everlasting barrier against the demands of the united working class. And the latter do not need to make a direct attack on the Constitution either. They have but to announce their demands, stand stubbornly by them, and the Constitution, so far as it technically disallows their demands, will be "slain in the house of its friends," and by its friends, too.

That famous Socialist phrase to the effect that the workers have nothing to lose but their chains, may, perhaps, in a certain sense, have strengthened the idea of the irresistible binding power of capitalist laws and constitutions. Yet, when the workers arise in their united strength, they will discover that these chains are in their united strength, they will discover that these chains are not manacles and fetters of steel or iron, but paper bonds that will poisons and other materials injurious burst automatically. The Times wants to leave the impression that to health used in industry, according because the workers on this side are apparently bound by an extra fetter called a Constitution, they are therefore bound by it for time and eternity.

And so they are while they imagine so, but not a moment longer.

One try, like that put forth by the British miners, and constitutions, parchments, "muniments of property rights" and "written fundamental statutes" snap like so many rotten pack threads, even though the labor giant makes no conscious and deliberate effort to burst them. The British miners made no request to Parliament to either enact a minimum wage or nationalize the mines, but the power they displayed forced the Parliament to consider both actions, despite all legal and economic opposition. And so will it be here in like case. Ten years ago Roosevelt forced the Pennsylvania coal barons to arbitrate with their employes under the threat of taking over their property by the government. It was "unconstitutional," perhaps, but none the less it was necessary, to settle a strike not one-hundredth part as fateful and menacing as the one now under way in
